daily commitment to practice certain core principles. The root or basis of these principles is what we call “the power of the human element.”. Two things are required to tap into and unleash the human element. The first is your ability to listen or, even better, your ability to learn how to listen.

Skip Prichard

When Blake, the main character of the book, meets the first of the five mentors that help him develop the heart of a leader, he is told that leaders think, "Others first." Leaders who think, "Others first," develop loyal followers who trust the leader and are much more likely to believe that the leader has their best interest in mind when the leader
